

Map to visit the Robert G. Ingersoll grave in Arlington National Cemetery via the Tourmobile bus ($8.50 ticket) and walking*.

- after disembarking from the bus, about a six minute (200 yard) walk along a sidewalk and then uphill on grass.
- hint: look for the 20 foot tall white obelisk marking a Vanderbilt grave. Ingersoll's is just north of it.

Visiting the Grave of Robert G. Ingersoll in Arlington National Cemetery

Arlington National Cemetery. The ashes of Robert G. Ingersoll (who died on July 25, 1899, just 2 weeks short of his 64th birthday from a heart attack) and his wife; Eva Parker, (who died 26 years later), were buried in a grave, on 4 May 1923.

On the oblong tomb are carved the words,

"Nothing is grander than to break chains from the bodies of men — nothing nobler than to destroy the phantoms of the soul."

The grave site, in Section # 3 number 1620, can be visited:

1. By taking a cab or private car to Arlington National Cemetery visitor's center, where one must go inside (with the grave number, the car's tag number and state) to get a vehicle pass and a map. With this pass and a map, drive past the security guard at the entrance to the cemetery and proceed to the gravesite.
2. or, by taking the METRO to Arlington Cemetery Station, then the Arlington Cemetery Tourmobile to the Tomb of the Unknown Soldiers stop and walk about 6 minutes or 300 yards (partly uphill grass) to the Ingersoll grave. (see map)
